Growers dismayed by aid amount

Associated Press

SEATTLE — Washington apple growers say they doubt they'll get much relief from the state's $92 million share of an $8.7 billion emergency farm assistance bill.

Even if the entire sum went to apple growers, it would be less than half of the $200 million loss on fruit grown in 1998, said Randy Smith, president of the Washington Growing Clearinghouse, which represents 2,800 orchardists in north-central Washington.

The allocation "isn't as much as we had hoped for and probably not enough to have a significant impact on the loss that occurred," he said.

"I haven't seen the fine print," added Smith. "We'll have to see how it plays out."

Sen. Slade Gorton, R-Wash., tried to reserve $50 million for fruit and vegetable growers nationwide, but that language was dropped.

President Clinton signed the measure into law on Friday. Most of the money, about $6 billion, will compensate farmers for depressed crop prices.

Washington's $92 million share "doesn't seem like enough, not for the whole state," said Ralph Longanecker, a retired third-generation grower in Tonasket.

Apple growers were dealt a multiple whammy last year — the lowest apple prices in a decade, the largest crops in history, growing competition from other countries and a heat wave that cut shelf life so the fruit had to be sold quickly at fire-sale prices.
